Lynn Street ABOUT

Lynn is a science-inspired author sharing lively STEAM stories with young readers. She loves concepts that cross disciplines, and personal narratives set against a sea of facts. Her passion is writing for curious observers who want to discover the wonders of their world.

Her writing celebrates nature and invites readers to slow down and explore, to become budding naturalists and citizen scientists. On daily walks in the woods, Lynn challenges herself to spot five new things—a hungry hawk, leaf buds, lichen, a spotted fawn, or a fallen tree. She uses drawing and journaling to engage with the world, and she believes a connection to nature is the key to caring for the environment and to joy. She volunteers at her local nature center and is dedicated to environmental education and integrating art, science, and language arts for kids.

Lynn grew up watching the wildlife in Tennessee, Kentucky, and Colorado, and she has called five other states home since then. She has lived in bustling cities and suburbs—and one small town with no fences where she climbed dogwood trees and roamed free on foot and by bike. The town did not have a library, and Scholastic and Weekly Reader titles were her lifeline to books.

Lynn wanted to be a writer from the time she was ten. Her first publication at age eleven was a letter to Cricket's Letterbox in Cricket Magazine. She entered and won writing competitions in high school, including a statewide essay contest. Lynn earned an MFA in poetry from the Vermont College of Fine Arts and enjoys bringing lyrical language to life.

Stephanie Fretwell-Hill at Red Fox Literary represents the author.

Find out more at www.lynnstreetbooks.com